“Civil Rights Movement in the US as an example of non violent civil resistance”

Tuesday, June 1, 2010, 10:45

Al. Niepodległości 22, room 317

(during Dr. Wojciech Lewandowski's class)

Kurt Schock, Associate Professor of Sociology and Global Affairs*

Education: Ph.D. in Sociology, The Ohio State University, 1995

Research Interests: Social movements, nonviolent resistance, political sociology, and social change.

Current Projects: Professor Schock is currently researching land reform and land rights movements in the global south. He is examining how civil resistance is being used to prevent land alienation and promote a more equitable distribution of land and resources. More broadly his research seeks to understand how methods of nonviolent action and 'people power' movements are able to successfully challenge state domination and economic exploitation.
